

Recruitment recovery

THE Australian legal service contributes $11 billion to the Australian economy and generates around $18 billion annually.

The sector employs almost 100,000 people in Australia and despite a slow down in recruitment last year, is now recovering and re-energised in 2010, according to legal executive search specialist Alex Correa.

“Last year was difficult but staff movement is now occurring. Firms are hiring again and many senior professionals are seeking new long-term opportunities,” she says.

“With the legal profession’s continued challenges of serviceability of clients, managing their people resourcing needs are now at the top of the agenda.”

After 15 years in Brisbane’s bustling legal scene, Correa has established her own executive search and placement firm.

Alex Correa Executive was set up to focus upon law firms and in-house legal teams of all sizes by sourcing the best legal talent to facilitate growth.

Correa has worked in a number of top tier and premier law firms as well as leading legal recruitment businesses and has particular expertise in providing career development advice and facilitating strategic career moves for lawyers.
